These results suggest that the use of the proposed model is not only feasible but also effective in predicting the performance of the system. The model can be used to predict the performance of the system under different conditions, which can help in the design and optimization of the system. Small-scale studies have shown that the use of a patient's own urine for the detection of urinary tract infections (UTIs) is a simple and effective method. A study by [Author et al., 2018] found that the use of a patient's own urine for the detection of UTIs was as accurate as a standard urine culture. The study involved 100 patients who were asked to provide a urine sample for a standard urine culture and a urine sample for a patient's own urine. The results showed that the use of a patient's own urine for the detection of UTIs was as accurate as a standard urine culture. The study also found that the use of a patient's own urine for the detection of UTIs was more convenient and less expensive than a standard urine culture. The study concluded that the use of a patient's own urine for the detection of UTIs is a simple and effective method.
